Speed Seduction Mastery Project
Module 2 Week 4 - Bonus

Okay, guys, this is a bonus mission for the end of Month Two.

Let's say you've done the Laughter Pattern. You've done Heart on Sleeve. You can see that the bimbo is wetting her panties.

What's next?

How do you phrase things so you don't ruin it? How do you avoid slipping back into the Average Frustrated Chump frame of:

"So, can I get your number?"

Or:

"You know, we should hang out sometime."

Weak. Weak.

So I'm going to tell you what to say.

By the way, let's say you're doing this at a party or an event. That's easier. You don't need to worry about exchanging contact information.

If you see she's all hot and bothered, she's touching you, and you're at an event, you simply say:

"You know, why don't we go somewhere a little more quiet where we can really focus in and enjoy?"

What did I say?

Focus in on what?

Enjoy what?

It's vague, so it's also safe because you're not making demands. You're not saying:

"Let's go back to my place."

That's often worked for me:

"Why don't we go somewhere a little bit more quiet where we can focus in and enjoy?"

If she says:

"What do you have in mind?"

You say:

"Well, let's go to mine."

Not, "Let's go to my place," but, "Let's go to mine."

If she says, "No, let's go to mine," or she says, "Why don't we grab a hotel?" that's all fine.

You can even say:

"Why don't we check out my car?"

I've even said to women:

"You know what? Let's go out to my car and make out like crazed teenagers."

You've just got to get a feel for this.

But let's say you're not at an event. You're at a supermarket or a coffee place.

How do you transition so you get that Day Two meeting?

Well, you're not going to ask for the phone number or any of the rest of that shit.

Why?

Because it automatically triggers that, "Oh, he wants to date me," kind of shit. Now you're back into that part of her mind that has that checklist:

He's got to be this tall, this old, this young.

I don't want that, guys.

So I put it like this:

"I really enjoyed talking to you. Normally, I wouldn't extend this kind of invitation to someone who I've chatted to for such a brief time. But if you're not with someone who's with you in the way you truly want them to be, I'd like you to spend some time with me, see how much we could really enjoy ourselves."

Now, guys, this is so powerful.

Let's take it apart.

Remember what we're not doing.

We're not asking for the phone number.

We're saying:

"I really enjoyed talking with you."

Now, at that point, what is she expecting?

A phone number request.

No. You don't do that.

"I've really enjoyed talking with you. Normally, I would never extend this kind of invitation..."

Notice those words:

"Extend this kind of invitation."

You're not asking for something. You're offering something.

I love those words.

"Normally, I would never extend this kind of invitation to someone who I've spoken to for such a short time, but..."

I know people say never say "but." The unconscious mind can't—fuck that.

"But if you're not with someone..."

Put your hand up before she can say anything.

"...who's with you in the way you truly want them to be."

Now, guys, that word "truly" has made me more money and gotten me laid so many times. It's an incredibly powerful word.

"If you're not with someone who's with you in the way you truly want them to be..."

Let's look at that.

First of all, any really attractive woman is likely going to be at least talking to some guy, banging some guy, being some guy's booty call, side piece, girlfriend.

Women are monkey branchers.

By that I mean they're like monkeys. They won't let go of both branches. They have to have one arm on the next branch before they'll completely let go of the current branch.

"If you're not with someone who's with you in the way you truly want them to be..."

That causes a trigger.

Remember, I talked in an earlier lesson about Milton Erickson and his great rule of utilization: if you know the client is going to have a behavior or a response, you use it.

Women are constantly questioning themselves, saying:

"Is he really the one for me?"

So when you use that word "truly," you're triggering that mechanism of self-doubt, of doubting him in the back of her mind.

"If you're not with someone who's with you in the way you truly want them to be, I'd like you to spend some time with me."

That is super powerful.

You're stating what you would like.

That is owning your intent. That is having big, huge brass balls, titanium balls, tungsten balls.

Now, you could say:

"I'd like us to spend some time together."

That's good. That's not quite as good as:

"I'd like you to spend some time with me."

Saying:

"Why don't we spend some time together?"

That's not bad.

But:

"I'd like you to spend some time with me."

That's really strong.

That's kind of like, maybe, make her pussy wet.

"See how much we could really enjoy..."

Enjoy what?

Or:

"See how much we could really enjoy each other."

Enjoy each other how?

What does that mean?

Does that mean going horseback riding? Does it mean a romantic walk on the beach? Does it mean rolling around in a tub of Jell-O with a Dalmatian?

It's left to the imagination.

Whenever you can get any person to imagine for themselves, it will be perceived as being their own thought.

At that point, you don't ask for the number. You hand them your phone. You just go like this and let them put in their contact information.

As soon as you get that, you text them saying:

"Hey, it's Dick. Now that you have my number, you'll know I'm not a telemarketer when I call you."

What happens next?

Get home, wait a few hours, and say:

"Hey, great meeting you. I'll give you a call. When's a good time to take a call?"

No. Fuck that.

I've used that before.

Just say:

"Hey, it's Dick. Let's go grab a pastry and some coffee. I've got Sunday at 3 p.m. or Tuesday at five."

Then shut your mouth.

Shut your fucking mouth.

If anything comes back other than, "Yeah, I'd love to," and she picks one of those two, you pick the place.

You never let her pick the place.

Be the man. Be the leader.

Women hate it when the guy says:

"Where do you want to go?"

Fuck that.

Give her the place and two choices of time.

If she gets back to you with:

"I'm really busy. Maybe another time."

That's a blow-off.

That means she's not interested. Trust me.

If she wants to meet up with you, she'll either cancel plans or she'll say:

"I really can't, but I really, truly want to see you. Can I make us dinner? Come over next Monday at seven. What do you like to eat? What should I cook?"

That's strong interest.

Don't let them string you along with:

"I'm really busy right now."

Now, one of the responses you may get is:

"I don't give out my number. Let me have your number."

Ah, the frame she's trying to set there.

What is the frame she's trying to set?

The frame is:

"I've got something that you value—my number—and you're not going to get it."

So I flip the frame.

I don't argue with her. I don't beg for the number.

I say:

"Now, Debbie, why would I put the burden of making sure we get to spend some time on your shoulders? Isn't that my work as the man?"

Then I shut up.

She'll crack up laughing because she's not expecting that answer.

It's breaking her pattern, and it happens to be true.

It is my job as the man.

"Now, Debbie, why would I put the burden of making sure we get to enjoy each other's company on your shoulders? Isn't that my work as the man?"

I hand her the phone again.

Now, sometimes you get the boyfriend objection:

"No, I'm sorry. I'm seeing someone."

Or:

"I have a boyfriend."

There are a couple ways to respond to that.

One way is:

"Hey, you don't need to convince me someone else finds you attractive. That's not how I make up my mind about you."

See how that's flipping the power frame again?

Hand her your phone again.

Another way to handle the boyfriend objection—it's always bullshit—is if she says:

"Well, I have a boyfriend."

I'll say:

"Hey, I understand. You know, it's sort of like a conversation I was having with my niece. She was asking me about the guy she was seeing, and she said, 'Uncle, I don't know if he's really the one for me.'"

See how I'm using quotes, guys?

I said:

"Ask yourself this question."

Now I'm quoting myself talking to my niece, but I'm really talking to Debbie.

"Ask yourself this question: Is he filling a role, or is he fulfilling needs that come from deep inside who you are, and from deep inside the woman you can see yourself becoming over and over again in your future?"

Hear that?

"Becoming over and over again in your future."

"Because if it's this second thing, stick with this. But if it's that first thing, maybe you owe it to yourself to explore."

Then shut your fucking mouth.

At that point, she's either going to grab your phone and put in her number, or she's going to say:

"You know what? He really does fit that second one. He really is someone who's fulfilling me."

At which point, bless him.

Seriously. That's so rare.

Bless him.

Say:

"Bless your heart. I hope your love continues to flourish and prosper and grow throughout the years."

"If it turns out that he's not with you in the way you truly want him to be, maybe you should take my information, because when that happens, you might think to yourself, 'Maybe that Ross guy knows something I don't.'"

That's the only time you should give out your information.

Okay, I hope this one makes sense.

It's pretty straightforward, and I'm really happy with this one. I've used it so many times.

Talk to you another time.
